Bringing Broadcastings

Film, art and journalism played a significant role in shaping Corinne's childhood, but when she transferred schools in the fifth grade, she learned not everyone had access to video journalism programs – igniting the beginnings of her Gold Award project. To create an integrated classroom program, Corinne developed lesson plans in collaboration with educators and school administrators to ensure students in K-12 could learn about journalism and media production. Corinne delivered an elementary school curriculum adaptable to the content taught in the classroom. Eager to engage more with students, she took the initiative to volunteer at her high school's video and television lab, where she mentored students who were interested in learning about video production. Through her project, Corinne discovered her passion for youth development and for instilling in students, skills they can continue to build upon throughout their lives. Corinne now attends the Honors College at the University of Arizona.
